SUCCESS, & EQUITY:
TURNING RESEARCH INTO PRACTICE

Decolonial research methods can take on many forms, in many spaces, and with many types of populations of people.

The researchers on this panel will discuss their various approaches to decolonizing methodologies and the spaces in which their research practices take place as it relates to their respective fields.

Each researcher will introduce their work, collectively address the following questions and then respond to questions from attendees.

The discussion will be guided by the following questions:

- 1. How do researchers ensure that the “voice” of participants is always privileged?
- 2. What happens if/when participants respond in ways that represent internalized colonization?
- 3. How do researchers consistently attend to these colonized tensions inherent in such work?
